The celebrated but unfortunate, Chevalier d'Eon, who has recently attracted the public attention by her laudable endeavors to ſupport herſelf, has been diſplaying her ſkill before a crouded and genteel company in the rooms at Southampton. An unfortunate accident damped the pleaſure which the general admiration of her ſkill had excited. The foil of her antagoniſt breaking as ſhe parried, it entered four inches above the right breaſt. The company preſent ſeemed to take a lively part in the misfortune of the Chevalier, but medical aſſiſtance was at hand, and it is hoped the wound may not be dangerous. London paper.

The council of elders has rejected the